If I was a grown up and I could chose any community to live in, I would chose a rural community. The first reason I would like to live in a rural community is because you have huge yards (front and back.) So if I had kids (and they whine) I wouldn't want to drive 40 or 50 miles just to buy toys. So I could just let them outside to play. And that's the first reason I want to live in a rural community.

The second reason I would like to live in a rural community is you can raise animals like horses and chickens. I could have my kids ride the horses, Snowy and Blizzard, after they're done with their chores! They would have to feed the chickens while I just "MAX and Relax" in the house. The last reason I want to live in a rural community is because you can pick fresh fruits. So when the kids are done with school and their chores we could pick fruits. I think the kids would love to pick the fabulous fruits because you could go into the pumpkin patch and pick the "Perfecto" pumpkin. We could also pick apples to make desserts such as apple pie, apple crisp, and Johnny cakes.

Those are the reasons I'd like to live in a rural community. There are huge yards, you can raise animals, and you can pick fresh fruits. That's why I think a rural community would be fantabulous.

Living in an Urban

Community

I love the city, there are many things to do there, many cultures, and lots of transportation.

One reason is that there are neighbors close by. On my way to school I could walk with my neighbor, clip-clop clip-clop. I could walk just a few blocks and my neighbor would be there. And if I'm having an important meeting with my neighbor and I'm in a hurry I could get there speedy quick, zip-zap-zip zap zoom!

Another reason is that there are many cultures in an urban community. Some different cultures are Chinese, Italian, Mexican, Puerto Rican, African, and Native American cultures.

I admire all these cultures. I think it is fascinating that there are so many lights in Diwali festival of lights.

My third reason is that there are history museums close by in the city, like the Smithsonian in Washington D.C. I could learn lots about ancient civilizations like ancient Egypt, ancient Greece, ancient India, ancient China, and ancient Rome. I would see things like paintings and sculptures at art museums. There are some museums like the National Museum of China. When you go to these museums you can play. I would learn lots of things like, did you know ancient China was the first to make paper?

My fourth reason is that there is lots of transportation. You can take buses, taxis, buses, subways, trolleys, and cars going honk honk. I can get where I want in many ways. There are so many people in a city so it is great that there is so much transportation.

My last reason is that there are many jobs in a city. If you need money to pay the bills you can get a job to pay the bills. Customers can buy food, clothing, and toys. Customers need doctors, hospitality, police, and firemen. Lots of people can earn money and live a healthy, happy, rich, joyous, wonderful life in an urban community.

So if you want to live in a rural community, that's fine, but I prefer an urban community. You should live there, too. It's fun, cool, and there's always something to do.
